

The no-call list has returned a degree of normalcy to our household. It has been wonderful this last year. In the past, phone calls would send us flying down the stairs to check who it was. 9 times out of 10 it was a telemarketer. Not only were they pushy on the phone but subversive and tricky. They try to get you to agree to something simply by verifying your name and address. No one needs a product they do not want and legitimate companies do not need to resort to this type of marketing. Please uphold the no-call list and allow my family to enjoy their personal time together.
